Notice and Notice, Voltage and Torrents: Developments in On-line Liability

Martha J. Savoy and Stéphane E. Caron[*]

While the matter proceeded uncontested, this decision shows the potential for significant awards of the damages under current provisions of the Copyright Act as well as the Courts' willingness to award appropriate substantial relief in cases of extensive infringement.

B- "Notice and Notice" and Obtaining User Identity

Users posting content on the Internet are subject to the notice and notice provisions. Once ISPs, hosts and search engines receive a notice of infringement from a rights holder, they are obliged to maintain records relating to the identity of the alleged infringing subscriber for a period of time so that the rights holder can seek to obtain the information by way of court proceedings.

This procedure can have a deterrent effect, as users receiving a notice through their host or ISP may be less inclined to avoid enforcement efforts by a rights holder.

Nevertheless, while rights holders can move before the Courts to seek disclosure of the identities of subscribers who have posted infringing content, there are criteria that must be met.

In Voltage Pictures LLC v. John Doe, 2014 FC 161, the Federal Court addressed the situation in which a rights holder wishes to enforce its rights against a content provider but the identity of the content provider is unknown. Voltage Pictures LLC ("Voltage"), a film production company, determined that a number of its films had been copied and distributed in Canada over peer-to-peer networks. Voltage was able to identify the IP address of the users; the date and time the files were distributed; the peer-to-peer networks used; and the metadata of the files including the names of the files and their size.
